What Did You Say? Oral History 101

There is a searching need among all of us to find inspiration for our times. Preserving the experiences of those who have come before us fills a void in the limited access to role models who can share their experiences and values with us as well as with future generations.

Our April program provides an introduction to oral history focusing on the art of interviewing. We hope it will stimulate your interest in conducting individual, family, and group interviews whether they be for personal, academic or professional projects.*

When oral histories put us in dialogue with each other, they illuminate the relationships between the narrators and other individuals. They serve to help us understand historical events in the context of social and professional connections and the larger community. Interviews create community for individuals today, and have the unknown potential to bring people together in the future.

Our speaker, Leah McGarrigle, conducted oral history interviews for the Regional Oral History Office of the Bancroft Library, UC Berkeley from 1994 to 2005, where she also taught introductory and advanced workshops for the university and the greater community. She taught oral history at Vista Community College in 1993. She currently conducts interviews and teaches oral history workshops locally. Leah has a B.A. in History from UC Santa Cruz, a J.D. from Hastings College of the Law, and is a member of the California State Bar. She and her family reside in Palo Alto.

*A handout, “Hints on How to Conduct an Oral History,” will be available at the meeting.
PAHA Collects Oral Histories

A remarkable woman named Betty Rogaway started the Palo Alto History Association on the path to collecting oral histories in the early '80s. Just before she retired from her long and distinguished career with the Palo Alto Unified School District, Betty applied for, and received, a small grant from PAUSD to collect oral histories from some of the district's pioneers and leading lights. Her subjects ranged from Ben Allen who was born in Palo Alto in 1912, went to PA schools and, later, drove a school bus, to Fremont Zschokke, grandson of Anna Zschokke who was one of the first settlers here and helped found the PA school system.

Over time Betty was joined by others like Judy Leahy. John Beahrs, Robert Vanderlip and Carolyn Caddes who expanded the field of interviewees to include civic leaders such as Birge Clark, arguably Palo Alto's premier architect, and Dr. Hewlett Lee, the founder of the Palo Alto Medical Clinic. Ruth Lacey added a further dimension to the later interviews by videotaping them for us to see as well as hear. Fascinating stories all, each portrays a unique piece of our heritage.

You, too, can access the collection of more than sixty recordings and hear such notables as "Bea" Elkins Crady, Stanford grad who arrived here in 1916 with her mother, a suffragette, and who describes life in boarding houses during WW II... or Fred Eyerly, Owner-Manager of Eyerly's Hardware who was also a City Council member, 1975 – 1983 and Mayor, 1982... or Betty Rogaway, that remarkable woman who started it all.

Recordings can be checked out from the Main Library's History Desk during Historian's hours: Tuesday evenings and Thursday afternoons.

As fill-in editor this month, I have the bully pulpit and intend to use it! PAHA is blessed to have a number of hard working committee members. They serve in very important but seldom heralded jobs with titles like Accessions/Archives, Computer/Photo Catalog, Landmarks and Streets, Membership, Oral Histories, Nominating, Programs, Publications, Publicity, Videotaping, Palo Alto History Museum liaison and Hospitality. Without their dedicated effort, PAHA would simply not exist. We thank them for all they do.

But none of these jobs is more important than editor of our newsletter, Tall Tree, PAHA’s voice to our membership and the general public.

Fortunately we have had stars in the editor role in recent years. Susan Bright Winn set new standards for the publication and the organization. Beginning this year, Ruth Lacey moved from being PAHA’s videographer to become its Tall Tree editor, and she made a good thing even better. I’m sorry to report that Ruth recently suffered a mild stroke and may sit out a few issues (just as she was hitting her stride). Those of you who know Ruth appreciate her intelligence and get-it-done attitude. A get well card addressed to her in care of PAHA (P.O. Box 193, PA 94302) would be appreciated, I’m sure. Ruth, your friends at PAHA miss you.
I was saddened to learn that the oldest home in Palo Alto soon will disappear. Undoubtedly it will be replaced by a new residence perhaps built in a style that imitates the original home only much larger.

The Juana Briones home on Old Adobe Road was originally constructed in the 1840s when California was still part of Mexico. Although altered over the years, it remains Palo Alto’s sole example of a much earlier time in California’s history.

Juana Briones was born more than 200 years ago in what today is Santa Cruz County, when California was a distant territory of Spain. Much of her adult life was spent as an early Californio entrepreneur in what is now San Francisco. She amassed enough wealth to buy a rancho here and retired with her family in the years before gold was discovered and California changed forever.

For several generations the Briones home was owned by a family that treasured its existence. In exchange for favorable property tax benefits they maintained the house and on occasion opened it to tours by the public. The 1989 earthquake caused serious damage to the structure that would have required a large investment of time and money to repair. Several changes in ownership since then and a lack of significant repairs have resulted in a building in poor condition. The present owners desired to demolish the historic house and replace it with a more modern residence on the large parcel of land.

A group of neighbors and members of the community interested in saving the Juana Briones home formed an organization to preserve it. They tried to purchase the property. When that proved unworkable, they sought to have the City of Palo Alto prohibit its demolition through the courts. (The City had some legal interest through the granting of a Mills Act for the property many years ago.) For various reasons these efforts were not successful, and now the group has stopped their battle to preserve the oldest house in Palo Alto.

While Palo Alto is losing its oldest building, the fight to preserve historic buildings in nearby communities continues. Foothill College is now looking to preserve the Griffin House. And Steve Jobs is no closer in his attempt to demolish the grand old Jackling house in Woodside since the community has stepped in to oppose its demolition. Yet these two homes, while fine examples of their time and place, pale in comparison to the rich history of the Juana Briones home. Millions of dollars have been spent and will continue to be spent to preserve California’s missions and the replicas of the lost missions. Meanwhile, Palo Alto’s only link with that era is going to disappear. And that is why I am so sad.
