AN EVENING WITH PROFESSOR MICHAEL SHANKS

Professor Shanks (courtesy of Michael Shanks)

On Wednesday, June 10, Stanford Professor Michael Shanks will be the featured speaker at the Palo Alto Historical Association Annual Dinner, this year in the El Palo Alto Room of the new Mitchell Park Community Center. A man of many degrees, interests, and talents, Michael Shanks is Professor of Archaeology and Codirector of the Revs Program at Stanford. He has worked on prehistoric monuments in Europe, the Greek cities of the Mediterranean, and is now exploring the Roman borders of northern England.

He sees a profound linkage between archaeology and design history: his studies of ancient perfume jars triggered a fascination with "practice-based" research and leadership in the d.school, the Hasso Plattner Institute of Design. In Stanford's Revs Program, he is promoting automotive archaeology, a focus on the material history of the automobile as it evolves into radically different forms. Professor Shanks serves on the Board of the Palo Alto History Museum. Join PAHA members, friends, and guests for "An Evening with Professor Michael Shanks."

PAHA and PAST—Partners in Preservation

The recent joint membership meeting of the Palo Alto Historical Association (PAHA) and Palo Alto Stanford Heritage (PAST) illustrated how they complement each other in preserving historically important structures, documents and artifacts city, now in its second century. Its time frame is short compared with many Eastern cities and early California settlements, but this was a period when the peninsula made the transition from an agricultural region to a vast urban population center. Mayfield, the oldest part of what is now Palo Alto, was a residential and commercial village, which merged with Palo Alto in 1925. Palo Alto developed as a city closely connected with the new Stanford University; it also housed a substantial population of rail commuters. With WWII and the emergence of the electronics industry, the city became the technology center it is today. Stanford and industry helped to connect us to the history that defines our city today.

PAHA maintains the City Archives so that anyone interested in Palo Alto history can access a large store of information dating back to the city's beginning. The archives, at Cubberley Center room K-7, are open Tuesdays 4 to 8 PM and Thursdays 1 to 5 PM. This store of information is constantly expanding and becoming more accessible as our staff places more of it online. City Historian Steve Staiger and a volunteer staff can help you find items of interest. PAHA's management of the archives is substantially funded by the Palo Alto Library. PAHA also encourages an interest in history with its presentations at the 10 general meetings, Sunday afternoons at the Lucie Stern Center.

PAST encourages preserving Palo Alto's historic structures. One of the most important concentrations of historic residences is "Professorville," a designated historic district where Stanford's early professors built grand and stately homes in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Through the efforts of PAST, this district has retained its character and remains much as it was a century ago. PAST also encourages adaptive reuse of buildings of historical significance and oversees renovations of historic buildings to ensure that Department of Interior guidelines are largely observed. PAST's efforts had an impact on the Children's Library and the College Terrace Library renovations.

Fallout Shelters

FROM THE DESK OF
THE HISTORIAN
Steve Staiger

I recently came across a carbon copy (that dates it!) of a typewritten document from the City of Palo Alto for “Building permits issued for the month of September, 1961.” Included were listings for new construction as well as for “additions and repairs.” The City issued 6 permits for new residences with a total valuation of $110,000 (average of $18,333 per residence.) One permit was issued for a new motel valued at $1,600,000 and 3 swimming pools with a total valuation of $11,200.

Prices have escalated in the last 50+ years! The real shocker to me was the item, for “fallout shelter.” In September, 1961, the City of Palo Alto issued permits for 3 fallout shelters. I assume that these were private installations for a family’s backyard. The 3 shelters’ permits were valued at $5143.

During the Cold War—at its height in the 1960s--the threat of nuclear attack was a serious concern for many Americans. Across the country, communities planned and built civil defense facilities to ensure the survival of their citizens. Palo Alto’s new City Hall, designed in the mid-1960s, provided protection from nuclear fallout. Schools emerged as popular sites for public, community fallout shelters. With enough concrete and earth around them, the shelters could protect their occupants from all but a direct hit.

For many citizens, community plans and provisions were not enough. Concerned residents built private shelters in their own backyards. Stocked with food, water, and other essentials, a family could survive underground for several weeks before it would be safe to come outside. A couple in southern California recently discovered a fully stocked fallout shelter in the backyard of their recently purchased home.

Today, fallout shelters are not in demand. With more powerful nuclear weapons and our location in Silicon Valley, a likely prime target of any attack, the need for a backyard shelter may be moot. Many sit abandoned in backyards; however, owners of some shelters have found new uses for their Cold War relics: transforming a shelter into a wine cellar is a not uncommon re-use in today’s Silicon Valley.
