Celebrating 25 Years of MOAH

MOAH BOARD CHAIR, JIM WALL, WILL PRESENT THE NOVEMBER 1 PROGRAM of the Palo Alto Historical Association where he will describe the history of the Museum of the American Heritage and celebrate its place and role in Palo Alto.

While MOAH and PAHA share a goal to preserve and publicize local history, they are separate institutions; each is governed differently. MOAH opened some of its collections to the public in 1990 on Alma Street and moved to its present home in 1997, the century-old Williams House, at 351 Homer Avenue.

In addition to collecting, assembling and exhibiting period artifacts, the MOAH Board renovated the Williams House and secured support from Mel and Bill Lane to restore its gardens. The Ruth Bell Lane Memorial “Victory Garden” replicates a garden design based on Sunset Magazine’s 1943 Vegetable Garden Book. MOAH’s permanent and rotating exhibits offer 5,000+ artifacts emphasizing invention and technology from 1750-1950. The permanent exhibits include an Early 20th Century Kitchen, a 1920s General Store, The Marshall Mathews Garage, and The Print Shop. Visitors will discover inventions that shaped America and which illustrate the evolution of technology, how and why it has influenced society from inception to the current time and a glimpse of future expectations.

MOAH currently celebrates its first 25 years with a special exhibition (see below); also check out this issue’s “Jaunts” to learn more about Palo Alto’s Repair Café, which meets periodically at MOAH.

Palo Alto annexes Mayfield

90 YEARS AGO, A LOCAL TABLOID NEWSPAPER HEADLINE might have read “California town disappears.” In 1925, Palo Alto voters approved Palo Alto’s annexation of Mayfield: within months almost all trace of Mayfield disappeared.

Mayfield, founded, in 1855, predated Palo Alto (incorporated 1894) by nearly 50 years. It centered on a business hub at the corner of Main Street (now El Camino Real) and Lincoln (now California Avenue) and was a thriving community serving surrounding farms, ranches, and lumbermen who worked in the hills to the West. While the 13 saloons and 2 breweries in town were evidence of the town’s economic vitality, they were a “black eye” to some residents.

Palo Alto outgrew its neighbor and in 1907, began to talk about annexation. Mayfield incorporated in 1903, and shut down the saloons, making both towns “semi-dry.” Annexation talks grew in 1918, when the Palo Alto Union High School District extended its boundaries to include Mayfield students. However, there was not enough support for annexation in either town because Mayfield and Palo Alto were so different. Palo Altans were wealthier and better educated than their Mayfield counterparts; they had come to Palo Alto from the Midwest or East Coast, while residents of Mayfield were mostly foreign-born and blue-collar. Palo Alto’s future was brighter than Mayfield’s.

In 1924, Mayfield voters considered but rejected annexation by 26 votes. In 1925, they reconsidered and approved it, 357 to 288. On July 2, 1925, Palo Alto voters voted to annex Mayfield, 1094 to 441. On July 6, 1925, the 1700 residents of Mayfield joined the 9000 residents of Palo Alto: they officially became Palo Altans.

Palo Alto erased the name Mayfield. It became South Palo Alto in the names of libraries and other government functions. Mayfield street names that duplicated Palo Alto’s were renamed: Lincoln became California Avenue. Not all residents of Mayfield were pleased with the changes. Warm feelings for their old town continued for decades. As late as the 1980s, some Palo Alto residents still considered themselves “Mayfieldians,” even though their town had disappeared 60 years before.
Recording oral history to preserve our identities

President’s column
Ralph Britton

My great-grandfather, Johan Caspar Hirsbrunner, arrived in New York July 31, 1851. He had a long journey by land and ship from Sumiswald, Switzerland, to New Jersey, where he worked in a button factory for $4 per month. He found better jobs and earned enough money to send for the lady he married upon her arrival in the US. Her voyage took 56 days as winds forced them to Nassau; there, the ship burned and the passengers lost all their possessions. Their story, which began in the 1850s, continued well into the 20th century!

How do I know all of this? My father typed up my great-grandfather’s 21-page story on his Remington portable typewriter. How very fortunate we are to have this document describing a journey and a world so different from our own. You may be surprised when events are remembered and described that have never been talked about. A year or two before he died, my cousin related how he flew “one and a half missions” over Germany in WWII. He parachuted down and spent two years in a stalag, a German prison camp.

No one had heard this story before!

My point: it is worth taking the time and effort to record oral histories while relatives and friends are alive with their memories intact. How sad to lose stories of interesting, historically relevant lives and with them a part of our own identity. My father probably used a notepad to collect my great-grandfather’s story and then to type it up on the old typewriter. Today we can record stories on digital media and start on a print version using voice recognition software. PAHA has a latent program to compile oral histories and assist members with such projects. We hope to revive the program and invite you to participate.

Don’t wait—it’s later than you think!
